

Imad Moosa is currently a Professor of Finance at Monash University, Melbourne. Before becoming an academic in 1991, he was an investment banker and a professional economist, and in that capacity he advised on currency strategies and was involved in exchange rate forecasting. He had received formal training on exchange rate modelling and forecasting at Wharton Econometrics in Philadelphia. Since becoming an academic, he has published some 150 articles and nine books, including two books on exchange rate forecasting (2000) and exchange rate regime choice (2005). He has served in a number of advisory positions, including his role as an economic advisor to the US Treasury on issues related to the reconstruction of the monetary sector in Iraq.